What's New in the CometBird?

The screen has to be updated? In the first version of HTTP, the user had to click on the Refresh button, which meant that a new request had to be made. In the second version of HTTP, the user had to select the Refresh option from the menu (or the command line). Since the menu is hidden in versions 2.0 and later, the user was redirected to the options window to select refresh. HTTP does not specify an implementation detail for the Refresh command, so it is left to the user's browser to handle. Browsers usually do this by asking the user to press the F5 key, which is a physical key, and even the link "refresh" on this page refreshes the page. For users not familiar with this behavior, it might be confusing. Therefore, HTTP is now HTTP/1.1, which includes a user agent-based option to specify that a page should be updated.

Configuring HTTP HTTP/1.1 HTTP header The HTTP/1.1 header can be sent with any request. It is not needed for every request, but you can send it if you want to tell the server that you are using HTTP/1.1 and the server must support it. You can add the header using the Set-Cookie header, as shown below. If you want to send the header in a previous request, send a header with a list of request headers to enable the server to make the right choice. For instance: GET / HTTP/1.0 Host: www.ibiblio.org HTTP/1.1 The HTTP/1.1 header is sent by default if you do not add it yourself. Using HTTP/1.1 When does HTTP/1.1 offer an advantage over HTTP/1.0? If your web browser has the capability, it will switch automatically to use HTTP/1.1

If your web browser does not support HTTP/1.1, it will be able to use HTTP/1.0. If your web browser supports only HTTP/1.1, and you are sending a request to a server that supports both HTTP/1.1 and HTTP/1.0, the server will use HTTP/1.1, since it is the most
