"Our goal is to capture a complete football match with 22 players in as many as 16 cameras and a total of about 100 sensors," said Michel Labrecque, Senior Technical Director at Massive. "We record all the game data in a highly compressed format and store it using industry-standard cloud technologies. This allows us to store very large volumes of data, providing enormous amounts of data that can feed our engine to create more realistic and connected football matches that are deeply customized and truly reflective of what is happening in the real world." Multiplayer matches also benefit from motion capture technology because players make decisions based on the data they have about what has happened, and to what degree, in the past matches and training sessions. Massive and EA Sports are now working closely together to make a more realistic version of football.
