To assess the efficacy of an exercise programme in reducing pain and improving functional capacity after 3 weeks in patients with acute neck pain. Randomised controlled trial. Eighty-one patients were randomly allocated to exercise group (EG), which received exercise therapy plus advice and instructions, or to a control group (CG), which received only advice and instructions. Primary outcome measure was pain at rest. Secondary measures were neck disability, general function, depression and anxiety. There was a significant main effect for time on all variables except depression and anxiety, and a time x treatment interaction for pain and neck disability. The analysis of treatment effects found a highly significant difference between the CG and the EG for pain at rest and neck disability. At post-treatment, the pain-related and disability-related improvement was more in EG than in CG. In patients with acute neck pain, an exercise programme can be safely introduced and of benefit.Q: How to stop a loop in javascript based on input from user I have a loop that will make an image move left and right on my web page.
