Ask HN: How do you do maintenance on your startup? - vbaskin I've been maintaining my startup for just over a year now. Most of the time I spend time writing or managing my customers. What else could I be spending my time on? ===== garethsprice One thing I have found is that I spent more time working than I should have in the beginning. Now, I'm not being lazy. I could easily be fiddling around on Hacker News. But it turned out that there are other aspects of my business that demand my attention even when I'm coding. If you have a profitable operation already, you shouldn't be as worried about someone thinking you're spending too much time on an exciting project. If you don't have a customer base and you're still exploring your market, you should be careful to not sabotage your customer relations because you're too busy working on a good idea. ----- garethsprice Other things I've found are: \- managing expenses \- managing payroll, tax planning, and dealing with new laws (e.g. healthcare for employees) \- keeping accurate copies of files \- getting legal documentation that prevents litigation (e.g. patents, copyrights, etc.) \- managing invoices and deposits \- managing invoices and payments \- managing bills \- making sure your customers are happy, even if you disagree with them \- procuring basic office supplies (paper, copy, etc.) \- hiring \- hiring, firing, contracting, working with, training \- managing servers, hosting, and any software that has to do with online access \- working out ways to cut costs/reduce expenses \- reviewing your estimates for the value of services you offer \- thinking about how to make things easier on your next hire \- finding ways to make the projects you're working on more efficient \- answering customer emails \- all the other things a typical business owner has to do that don't have to do with the business \- and thinking of ways to make them better -----
