Stay tuned for the Season 7 premiere of America's got talent on NBC this September! We're excited for it. Preparing for season 7 involves creating new systems as well as writing cleanly and efficiently. But what about all the existing code? There's too much code for 1 person to maintain. Too many bugs and other issues end up on my desk. But I wasn't able to just throw it all away and start over. And it still needed to be included in the new codebase. So how could I add it? To solve this, I needed a big team of people. But there's always overhead when going up a level in your organization. You need more resources. So I considered sharing the work with them. And it didn't take much more work to make it happen. Eventually, the team split into two groups: one to expand the new codebase and the other to expand the old codebase. This is a pretty common situation. A code refactor is a fairly expensive proposition. For this project, the team spent close to 90% of their time on the new codebase. Only a small portion of the team remained for the existing codebase. They were tasked with simplifying the old codebase without rewriting it. They also had to manage their work in a way that would make it easy for the other team to tackle the existing code. This all took a lot of planning and communication on both the team and management levels.
